A GROWING INTEREST IN THE FIELD

This past week was definitely a journey. I learned how to create an official resume, which I believe will look better and better as I increase my achievements and experience. I had to experiment with different templates and tools, which took a long time, but I eventually completed my resume with a really clean design that can encompass all of my experiences and personal information. It is a really good representation of who I am.

Additionally, I wrote my second research assessment, which was a whole lot better than the first one that I wrote. It flowed a lot better and it was incredibly easier to write since I figured out how to write one. The more research that I do on my topic, the more that my interest in it grows. This field appears to be perfect so far. It encompasses different aspects of various medical fields and puts it all into one occupation.

As for time management, it is still a struggle, but it is improving. My goals for this week are to finish all work by 11pm in order to make more time to focus on ISM as well as to gain a lot more knowledge in the field this week and to keep improving my resume and portfolio to be ready for the business symposium.
