

NEARING THE DEADLINE FOR THE FINAL PROJECT

As the deadline for the original work project nears, I am feeling comfortable with the work I have done so far. I have done a significant amount of research and all that is left to be done is a little more research and diving into the design of the final product. This past week, I just did research for the original work and an assessment summarizing my original work research. I am worried about converting my concept drawings by hand to a computerized design, but I feel like I will figure it out. I do have some questions about my original work that I am currently working out and may ask about, but overall I am comfortable with my standing. I am surprised with my success managing my time in this first semester project that I have ever done. I pretty much evenly spaced out my time and successfully got to the stage I need to be. All I need to do is to scan my concept drawings in and to work on designing my final product on the computer, as well as back-logging some work that I had forgotten to log.

So far, I have been noticing growth with my success in doing assignments on time in ISM and the quality of my overall work. I actually worked on my semester project somewhat throughout the semester. I should have been doing more to figure out the computer design before this week, but at least I am showing growth and I can still manage to figure this out in a week.

I am extremely excited for what this week will bring and I have lots of plans for it. I will do some extra research into the three procedures that I decided to base my project around and will log all of my work into the original work log. Additionally, I will need to convert my concept drawings into a computerized official design and that I plan to create a prototype of my project in the spring semester. I hope to make this design really great in order to possibly allow it to be tried out in a hospital. I am confident in the idea since the professionals that I talked to seemed to really like it; it is a matter of execution. I came up with this idea to benefit the profession and I intend to have it do just that.
